Photosynthesis is the process by which green plants use sunlight to make food from carbon dioxide and water. It takes place in the chloroplasts, which contain chlorophyll. Oxygen is released as a by-product of the reaction.

Respiration releases energy from food. In plants and animals it happens in the mitochondria of every cell, and carbon dioxide and water are produced.